With brazen indifference to the purport of her words, Laura Carter, the woman of the Tenderloin, who betrayed Chester B. Runyan, the fugitive paying teller of the Windsor Trust Company, to the police, admitted to-day that she had her share of the $95,000 he took from the bank last Saturday.

"Runyan gave me the money," she informed the detectives on the way down to Police Headquarters from the West One Hundred and Twenty-fifth street police station in a subway express, "I have put it in a bank where I have a private account, and it will stay there, too, if I can have my say about it.

"Why, if I had wanted to take it I could have had all of the money Runyan brought to our flat at No. 619 West-One Hundred and Fortyfourth street," the woman added in a tone of pure bravado. "He was about the easiest mark I have ever met in my life, and it was almost a shame to take the money from him.
